Nigerian Army, rising to command the Unit in 1963. He was also the first Commander of the 2nd Division (Rear), based in Ibadan. He later became Commander of the Garrison, a position he held until May 1969 when he was appointed General Officer Commanding 3 Infantry Division.

His most famous assignment was the command of the Third Marine Commando Division of the Nigerian Army operating the South-Eastern front during the Nigerian civil war. He led the men of the Division into victory over the rebels and accepted the surrender of the rebel forces.

At the end of the civil war, he returned to the headship of the Engineering Corps of the Nigerian Army. After his course at the Royal College of Defence Studies, he was appointed Federal Commissioner for Works and Housing in January 1975 in the government of General Yakubu Gowon which was overthrown in July of the same year. He was subsequently appointed Chief of Staff, Supreme Headquarters.

As Chief of Staff, Supreme Headquarters, General Obasanjo was the second in command in the government of General Murtala Muhammed. He was 'de facto' Prime Minister, seeing to the day-to-day running of the government in accordance with the policies laid down by the Supreme Military Council under the leadership of General Muhammed.

Following the abortive coup of February 13, 1976, in which General Muhammed was assassinated, General Obasanjo was unanimously chosen by the Supreme Military Council to become the Head of the Federal Military Government and Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of the Federal Republic of Nigeria.

General Obasanjo is a Yoruba. But he prefers to be regarded as a Nigerian. In his own words : "it is true that to be a Nigerian one has to be born in one part of the country, but my greatest wish has always been to be seen and regarded as a Nigerian first and foremost."

He is a teetotaller and does not smoke. His recreation is games, like table tennis, billiard, snooker and squash.

General Obasanjo is married with five children.
